David Miliband: we need a second vote on Brexit deal

■ Former Labour minister enters fray over Europe

■ Fightback urged on 'act of economic self-ham'

by Jamie Doward

David Miliband makes a dramatic entry into the debate about Britain's exit from the EU today with an impassioned and be politicians from all parties to work together to avoid the Tory high economic driving the country 'off a cliff'.

Labour's former foreign secretary says that Brexit is an "act of economic self-harm" and suggests that it is up to MPs of all political colours to halt back another Brexit ship is significant. Fabrice Wurtzbach talks over the summer recess has triggered speculation about the creation of a new anti-Brexit party joined by heavy-weight from all sides.

But a more likely scenario is the emergence of cross-party consensus around a plan for the UK to remain part of the European Economic Area (EEA), at least for a transition period. This would provide free trading access and deal with the Tories.
